

Jim, the Newsboy

Jim stood on the street corner liberating. The cold wind tore round the corner and threatened to snatch the cap from his head. Jim did not mind the wind. He had had an unusual streak of good luck that afternoon and sold off all his papers early and now stood jingling several coins in his pocket—coins which meant for him a good hot supper and a night's lodging.

He turned and sauntered along, crossing street after street, till he had wandered into a section of the city where he very rarely came, a most prosperous section, judging from the fine broad avenue.

Jim was cold by this time and thought that he would retreat his steps when his attention was attracted by the sound of music. It came from a church close by, the door of which stood invitingly open. It looked nice and warm inside. There was no one in sight, and Jim softly stepped in and sat down at the back of the church, which was in semidarkness.

The only lights were away down at the other end, where were gathered a group of boys about Jim's age and a man seated at an organ. Soon the man began to play and the boys to sing. Now, one would hardly have guessed on seeing Jim that he was a musician himself, but he had a great reputation among his friends, who were sure that not one of the famous ing the music that Jim had heard them learning.

In their choir garments they looked little like the rough, careless boys of the day before. He did not know that the boy with the beautiful voice who was to have sung the solo part had suddenly been taken ill and that the organist, in despair, had been obliged to substitute in his place one of the other boys who was not capable of filling it, but was the best that the organist could find on such short notice.

So Jim did not know what to make of it when he saw the boy evidently preparing to sing alone. Jim knew each boy's capabilities in a musical way by this time as well as the organist himself did, and he knew that this boy could not sing the music properly. The organist began to play; the boy looked frightened. It was time for him to begin. He hesitated and choked. The organist turned partly round. The next instant a voice of wonderful strength and sweetness filled the church.

After a single start the organist played steadily on. He did not know from whence or whom the heavenly voice proceeded, but it was God sent. Through to the end, without fear or faltering, glowing and thrilling with joy and love and devotion, Jim poured out his soul.

When the first pure tones had died away and he realized what he had singers of the day had a voice that could compare in sweetness with Jim's.

Jim was interested at once when he heard music in the church. Oh, the beautiful music! He had never heard anything like it in his life. It made him almost unhappy at one moment, and he would rise to go, only it held him so that he could not.

But the boys! His astonishment rose as he heard and watched them. The man was evidently trying to teach them something, but some were careless and would not listen, and others were stupid and could not learn. Finally the boys became so restless that the man rose and, closing the organ, told them all to come the next afternoon, and immediately there was a wild scramble for the door.

That night Jim would neither play nor whistle for his friends, to their great surprise, but the grand, uplifting strains which he had heard that afternoon still lingered in his ears.

The next afternoon as soon as his papers were sold Jim started again for the church and the next and the next as well. Every afternoon found him a quiet, unobtrusive listener at the back of the great chancel.

The master went over and over the strains slowly, carefully and patiently, while the boys blundered and hesitated. Jim had learned the whole thing by the second afternoon and could have sung every note of it.

Jim was completely out of patience with one boy. He had a beautiful part to sing alone, evidently the climax of the whole piece, and he had a voice like a skylark, so pure and clear. But it was such a task to teach him anything!

What he apparently learned one day was forgotten the next, and Jim fidgeted and muttered to himself in disgust at the bungling work which he made of it.

They were getting ready for an Easter celebration, as Jim learned from the conversation, and he made up his mind that he would be there on that day himself. He had attended so many of the rehearsals by this time that he felt quite at home in the church, but it seemed a very different place to him in the light of the bright spring morning when Jim walked up to the door on Easter day.

The many carriages, the throngs of gayly dressed people, so abashed him that he hardly dared go in, but he finally found an opportunity to do so unobserved and slipped quietly into his accustomed seat. The church quickly filled, even to the corner where Jim sat.

After awhile there was a sound of distant shuffling, and soon the boys came walking in procession and singing done he would have rushed out if possible, but kindly hands gently detained him till the service was over and the surprise and wonder and admiration of the people could find expression.

Of course that was the beginning of a great change in Jim's life. The night-ingle in his throat could no longer be hidden. It had brought to him friends and fortune. But in the future years people liked to tell the story of his first public appearance, when he sang because his bursting heart could not contain

SHACKLING OF DAVIS.
The Man Who Performed the Fast End a Hard Time of It.

The blacksmith advanced with the shackles, and seeing that the prisoner had one foot upon the chair near his bedside, his right hand resting on the back of it, the brawny mechanic made an attempt to slip one of the shackles over the ankle so raised; but as if with the vengeance and strength which frenzy can impart even to the weakest invalid, Mr. Davis suddenly seized his assailant and hurled him half way across the room.

On this Capt. Titlow turned, and seeing that Davis had backed against the wall for further resistance, began to remonstrate, pointing out in brief, clear language that this course was madness and that orders must be enforced at any cost. "Why compel me," he said, "to add the further indignity of personal violence to the necessity of your being ironed?"

"I am a prisoner of war," fiercely retorted Davis; "I have been a soldier in the armies of America and know how to die. Only kill me, and my last breath shall be a blessing on your head. But while I have life and strength to resist, for myself and for my people, this thing shall not be done."

Hereupon Capt. Titlow called in a sergeant and file of soldiers from the next room, and the sergeant advanced to seize the prisoner. Immediately Mr. Davis flew on him, seized his musket and attempted to wrench it from his grasp.

Of course such a scene could have but one issue. There was a short, passionate scuffle. In a moment Davis was flung upon his bed and before his four powerful assailants removed their hands from his, the blacksmith and his assistant had done their work—one securing the right arm on the right ankle, while the other turned the key in the padlock on the left.

This done, Mr. Davis lay for a moment as if in a stupor. Then slowly raising himself and turning around, he dropped his shackled feet to the floor. The harsh clank of the striking chain seems first to have recalled him to his situation, and, dropping his face into his hands, he burst into a passionate flood of sobbing, rocking to and fro and muttering at brief intervals: "Oh, the shame, the shame!"—Brevet Lieut. Col. John J. Craven, M. D. U. S. V., in Pearson's Magazine.

Taking a Mean Advantage.
